Shirtings in English Flannels, Zephyr, A few minutes after 5 o'clock on the after neon of last Saturday a small man, rigid of moustache, and a large man, voluminous of swiftly to the sidewalk is front of the White House. There a crowd of illers and strang ers was gathered. The last of Mrs. Cleveland's receptions was going on. To avoid the crowd, the carriage was driven to the west gate in the rear of the White House. The large man, who had already been recognized by the crowd as the Hon. Grover Cleveland, scrambled heavily to the side-walk and bade the driver take home Col. Daniel Lamont.

Daniel Lamont.

The carriage drove away. Mr. Cleveland put his hand stoutly to the gate and found it unamenable to pushing, securely fine the ploughed his broad forehead. "Well, this is a pretty business," he murmured, as he strode around the rear of the grounds to the Treasury gate. He put his hand to this, too. He turned the handle, he rattled and shock and pushed, but in vain. He put his big shoulder against it, but it showed no relenting. The night was chill, but rills of perspiration welled over his manly face. His wrist was strained with tugging at the gates, his fingers were stiff, his feet were cold. Fire flashed from his eyes, and his heart was heavy. He felt himself to be ocbeart was heavy. He felt himself to be oc-tupying an absurd position; and the dread of being ridiculous is singularly acute in persons beyond the ordinary weight of man.

It was most absurd. The hum of many voices reached him from the interior of the house some soft Hungarian air was floating from the band stationed in the vestibule; as he knew, the rooms blazed with lights and bloomed with flowers, and many lovely women, and one, the loveliest of all to his mind, were listening with one can to the mind, were listening with one car to that bright melody, and with the other receiving the compliments due to their charms. Yes, bis wife was inside and he was locked out.

Mrs. Cleveland was giving a reception, and

Mr. Cleveland, unregarded and uncomfortabie, was kicking his shins at the Treasury gate, and wondering by what blind fortuity or act of human idiany he was thus evolved. or act of human idiocy he was thus excluded from his home, unwillingly divorced from his own wife, and made to wait like a creditor or a poor relation. But at last somebody happened to look out from a window of the White House and saw the luckless Presideut, and bade unlock the gate and let him in. Then it appeared that orders had been given to close the gates at 5 o'clock, to prevent the admission of any more guests. The explanation was satisfactory, but Brother Cleveland had not enjoyed waiting.

And yet it might have been profitable to him for reproof and instruction if no friendly eye had seen him from the window and no friendly hand ended his lockout. Those few minutes of impatient and angry delay, that surprise and disgust at finding himself shut cut from his own house, should give him at least some sluggish feeling of the wrath and weariness with which the democratic administration. And as yet no friendly hand opens the gates. They are not shut out by negligance or mistly hand opens the gates. They are not shut out by negligance or mistly hand opens the gates. by set purpose; and that is where the bit-terness of waiting lies. Remember, Grover Claveland, with what impatient shiverings and stampings you chilled your nose against the Treasury entrance to the White House, and what a fiet and ferment possessed you to buin. Hear the democrats thundering away at your administration. Bounce your EXCELSION DYCS
